In this issue of Memoryhouse, we invite you to grit your teeth and step into the crossfire of a clash. These pieces convey personal narratives of conflict and dissonance, exploring what happens before, during, and after a collision. Our authors reveal the clashes that occur between people on a gritty neighborhood street, inside a tedious office, and behind a bedroom door. Many of the narratives told here focus on the pain left behind after a clash, whether heartbreak, wrenching grief, physical discomfort, or sheer terror. In these pages, you'll find pieces that capture the inexplicable moments when things don't fit together. We hope that this issue leaves you rattled but satisfied.
july on 19th street ................................................................. 9 natalie rose richardson

mail dumped on desk .......................................................... 10
  joan mcnerney

interstellar song ................................................................. 14 richard king perkins ii

finding out my lover is in jail ............................................. 18 cheryl kutcher

shards ................................................................................. 19 caroline carter

soul arson ............................................................................. 20 iris orpi

my brother’s black leather jacket ....................................... 24 brian koester

the choice to remain in disrepair ....................................... 26
  iris orpi

this is how you lose him ....................................................... 32 sarah saltiel

i am junk .................................................................................. 36
  joan mcnerney

contacts .................................................................................. 37
  cheryl kutcher

still life with coyote .............................................................. 40
  brian koester

breaking point ....................................................................... 44 joseph murphy
memoryhouse is a quarterly student-run publication that curates the personal narratives of the uchicago community and beyond through creative writing and visual art. in addition, the organization features a performance ensemble called memento and hosts a variety of literary events, performances, and workshops each quarter.

to learn about joining memoryhouse or submitting work, please visit chicagomemoryhouse.wordpress.com founded 2012, alida miranda-wolff cover photo by gretchen gales

You visit your father’s new place—next to the Catholic church—and he parades you down the block, his hand owning the plot between your shoulders, while you nod to men with names like Jr. & Rico & QB: stoop-sitting, odd-job, wife-beater men, Tecate & Cuervo men, cross-bearing men who eye you soft when your father isn’t around. But that’s just how it is. Jr. fucks the neighbor girl all the time, hard, how she likes it, got caught & cuts her pops deals on blow. You know all the stories like you know your own tongue. Fourth of July, QB blockades the street with his Chevy & houses pool funds for plastic carnival stands to sell elotes, mango nada, plastic cups of sliced mango & pineapple sprinkled with tajín. Later, Jr. & Rico light fireworks in the street; all night the cylinders fire horizontally, blunting windshields & porches. The sound of bones cracking again, again. That’s just how it is. Even your Wall Street, Civil War zealot father is one of these men. He’s a risk-taking drunk. Recently out a job. Worships a dead language—I need you to understand—When I think of my father’s new life, I think of Jr. & Rico, their dripping necks bent like hoses over the blooming firecrackers. The changing block, the pink line carving a path into & out of July on 19th Street.

When I think of what we’ve become, I see the parade: the lurch of bodies ducking from fire, bones cracking; a sweet taste cut with spice to make you spit your teeth. On a shelf, the books mapping our wounds gather unwanted dust; the church steeple outside horning its blade into the sky’s pink.
mail dumped on desk

joan mcnerney

mechanical ethel index cards slowly grow from index fingers staples pinch arms together i toss my hair tresses of paper clips

the boss posed deciduously
"j, would you go to the duplicating room..."
he has silver dollar eyes & wears a pink shirt

scissor stepping down hall did he say he wanted a xerox of me?
an extra waitress
could come in handy & there are never enough good repairmen

well, i giggled into orange paper bin you'll have to screw yourself,
my friend.
interstellar song

I don’t wish this upon you but by the second day of spring, you’ll be sad again.

I’m sorry for stating the obvious.

The best medicine is something beyond seasonal and silent as interstellar song.

I don’t need a moral loophole because the loophole is your illicit behavior and my abiding interest.

I hope it’s enough to overwhelm your common sense and further need for Spanish mission sunlight.

Your hands are blunt stubs of internecine warfare; touching yourself, punching yourself will only take you so far from me.

It’s an unusual thing to say we don’t know each other but still, we struggle to become even closer.

The Texas rain watches. It does not interfere.

We curl up together in our separate blankets of skin.

The moisture that leaves our eyes eventually dries but remains a living thing.
he keeps speeding,
keeps getting stopped,
keeps getting taken away.
I can't turn the car from the 5 p.m. sun, an orange spotlight through the windshield. I can't stay on the phone because there is not much his sister can say except, "I'll call when I know more." I can't slow down because others expect me to move forward. This is only the beginning of beginnings. I can't change the details: he keeps speeding, keeps getting stopped, keeps getting taken away. I can't comprehend the danger of driving while Mexican. I can't call him but my pulse pushes my fingers toward dialing a familiar number, over and over and over. I can turn down the radio and wonder about the noise inside the other cars, if they are as quiet as they seem from here. I can clutch the phone in my hand, jump at every vibration. I can shiver in the shadows of trees I drive under, not often enough, and feel a brief reprieve from the glaring light and heat. This is the easy part. I continue driving, my muscles remembering which turns to make to get home.

I've got shards in my stomach, shards from the stomach itself, so when it cuts food, it cuts itself. I think they must be glass, plenty thin and clear to slip past tests, but enough to gouge my insides, make me throw-up dinner and water and air, and do it every other night.

The thing about glass is that it reflects, so when people look at me, stomach full of glass, the first thing they see is themselves—not the shards, not me, just them and their own inscrutable pain. It takes focus to see behind glass at night, sitting at a dark picture window with someone on the other side. You've got to lean in close to do it honestly, or if not, at least know what you're trying to see. You've got to have a keyword, something to google when they've got their back turned. You've got to print out a picture and tape it up between, so you can tell it with a sympathetic smile: ah, I get what you mean.

But my shards have no name, no diagnosis, no WebMD entry to prove I'm being serious. All I've got are midnight hours of plastic bags and porcelain thrones and afternoons spent going to the hospital alone. So from the window's other side, I've got a perfect view, not of your shards, but of how you see mine, of whether you're looking at me or at your pain in my eyes.
The pain would come later.
The blue and black bruises the shape of man-sized fingers would not form for another few hours, and the heart would not be aware of the long coffin nails until days after.

All of the moment is fear
a fast approaching end
that tastes like burning ash
and the red tint of sky behind the death black of a stormy night,
the panic while I teeter on the brink of choking and the realization that he is too strong and I can't push him off and he is about to drain the ocean out of my soul without my permission, my pounding heartbeat incinerating the helpless silence of the walls my brain tries to shut down as disgrace fell the size of a hungry boar and smoldering anthills of self-doubt tear

my flesh apart
over and over and over while I watch the crack of light under the door not knowing whether I am praying for someone to walk in and see my splayed nakedness, or for the absolute non-appearance of deliverance

and oh, I am tired and bleeding and worried about the stains how many minutes has it been and when will it end?

and is the floor falling into the ceiling, and can anyone hear the clock ticking?
every second is a “No”
unhonored,
mocked.
The mute terror sprouts lesions of guilt and shame that spread out through the body like fire devouring a house while I am trapped inside, hoping desperately that something will be left to save if I can't move
under his brutish weight until the whole damned place is razed.
All of the moment is fear

a fast approaching end

that tastes like burning ash

and the red tint of sky

All of the moment is fear
A faint smell of pale electric blue zapped me, as soon as I touched it.
I brought myself to pick it up.
I was two, and he still a baby when they set him down in my lap to hold.
All I could do was freeze, so I wouldn't drop him. Now his heavy jacket was just as hard to handle. The current traveled up my arms and blossomed:
Despair, fear, drive and anger, what they must mean by mixed-state agitated depression. A stew boiling with unbearable flavor.
I tried not to drop him. I really did.
He is a withered husk of a man with his spirit permanently hunched over slinking away in tiptoes on family reunions
at the first sign of his ex-wife or his children’s arrival, as if breathing the same air as the people he had abandoned decades ago were impossible
and would burn him alive.
His sons have grown to be fine, upstanding gentlemen who love their own kids just a little too fiercely; his daughters’ trust issues with men kept their needs complex, streaked with defiance and covetous of solitude.
They have divided forgiveness among them, unevenly.
One swallowed it dry and found it tasted like burnt pride.
Others carried it in their hands until it softened and rubbed it against their bruises.

The last one sat it on the shelf for years, forgotten until it took on the shape of a wedge that he now uses to prop his door wide open.
If only he would gather the words and offer them. Maybe whomever he had pawned his life to would sell a part of it back to him.
He missed our wedding and it was the first time I saw my man weep.

He came to me, later while I was recovering from childbirth in a lovely little room with lilies and whose windows let in the lake breeze, healing my body with sleep and ballads from Sugarfree.
He picked the time when his son was away at work.
He wore a suit that reeked of cigarette smoke and missed chances, and all his words were drunk with sadness no matter what he said.
He talked a lot but left without saying anything.
And when he was gone
there was a dark imprint of hunger
that lingered where he had sat and felt more tangible than his presence had been,
reminding me of an empty womb and my newborn son, somewhere in the building, being held and cared for by somebody else’s hands.
when he was gone
there was a dark imprint of hunger
that lingered where he had sat
You tell him that you love him for the first time in the dark, choking on the word and breathing it against his skin because you know that this word will be like poison. Maybe that's when the end starts, because really, you knew how the whole thing would go and you say it anyway, don't you?

You had said that you loved him before, just never in ways that got back to him. You announced it out loud to your roommates while lying drunk on the floor, and they just got those looks on their faces like won't you please just shut up about this guy already, of course you're in love with him, we already knew that.

A few weeks later, you're lying in bed with him and tell him that you're going to write a story on his skin and in the middle of the story you write in your messiest handwriting I love you I love you I love you I love you, just to try the words out. You make sure to smudge the ink with your hand as you write so that when he looks down at his chest, there's no way that he can read those smudgy, messy, upside down words, nu-uh, no way in Hell.

Now it's eight months and you're whispering I love you to him in the dark because he's the sort of type where nothing terrifies him more and your secret is that you're that type too. Gotta scare him off before he gets the chance to say it back, because you know that once he does, there's no way he's sticking around and so this is the way it's gotta be. You knew what you were doing, right?

You knew for sure the first time when you were sitting on his floor—all important things must happen on a floor. But you were sitting on his floor and he was drawing on his window with a marker, one of those erasable ones, trying to explain some math concept. You've never been big on math, don't have a brain for numbers and so you kept telling him that this doesn't fit in your head and he kept underlining the same thing, writing more numbers as if that would turn the unfamiliar familiar. He never went near the sun that you drew on the top right side of his window—he left that up there until the day he moved out and when the light shone through the window, there'd be an outline of the sun stretched out across his floor.

So he was trying to teach you math and you were trying to tell him that there are things in this world that make so much sense that you can breathe them in and out but math isn't one of them and he got so goddamned frustrated that he threw a pillow at you. You couldn't stop laughing. You laughed so hard that you lost a piece of yourself to him and that was when you lost—

That was when you loved him.

In the months that passed, sometimes you would get so close to calling out to that piece, always in the moments that thinned the line between the things that you should and shouldn't say—in the last seconds before you both fell asleep, when you were singing quietly to him, or when you were clutching his body to yours and you felt like you just couldn't get close enough. In those moments you held your I love you's on the tip of your tongue, had to catch them there when they flew up from the back of your throat.

Because maybe he loved you. Or maybe he didn't. But he needed aloneness, needed to exist in the mindspace of being alone even as he physically held you close. He didn't need you. Even if he loved you, he wouldn't have known it. And you knew that.

So you didn't say anything for months and choked down your words. When you went on walks with him, you would pick flowers and when you left in the mornings, you left them on his desk, his chair, by his window. You left them, hoping he would find them later and think of you, and maybe he would know that they weren't the only things that you left behind.
But you always knew that he was going to be the one doing the leaving and so it took you four months to let yourself love him and eight months to tell him that you did because there were things more precious to you than saying the words that clutched at your insides. And when you did, it took him two weeks to say goodbye.

The first thing is the essay—he tells you that it’s got to get done and so he won’t be seeing you much that week and you don’t argue because you don’t want to be that type of girlfriend—the real clingy type, and so you tell him no problem, and tell yourself that things are fine. Everything’s fine.

He comes over after the essay is due and you have sex (probably, though you’ve been together long enough that you don’t really remember the individual times and what happened when) and your roommates turn the volume on the tv up and afterwards you lie in bed and ask him if things are alright, if he’s happy. He tells you not to worry about that now, that it’s not something to be anxious about. Everything’s fine.

Now he’s not real good with emotions, and you always knew that. You wished that he would get excited about you the same way he got really excited about hard math problems.

Every morning you stayed over, he’d have class before you did and would let you sleep in so you’d leave him a note on his desk--a drawing or a joke or a list of things that made you happy (a list that he was always on). When he breaks up with you he tells you that he’s kept every note. Why does he tell you that? And now you’re crying and he’s crying and you’re just really wishing that you hadn’t said I love you.

You tell them that you’re fine, fine, and then you fall over yourself through the next two weeks and you need a goddamned sign on your door saying this room has gone 36 hours without bursting into tears. For the first week, you just about don’t leave the house except to go to class and do your goddamn civic duty and vote (Trump wins, because of course Trump wins.)

The next week you sit in the sun with a really good sandwich and that’s probably the highlight of the whole week. You go to a party and drink a little more than you should, but still not enough and bring home some guy, real tall guy. He’s drunk enough that he tells you about his parental issues and so maybe he understands what it’s like to have a week and a half in pajamas wanting to hide in your bed. He spends three hours talking to you, hopefully because he’s drunk and not because he likes you, before you get impatient and kiss him for a whole two minutes before then kicking him out of the house.

He didn’t stay over? Your roommate asks when he finds you sitting on the kitchen floor crying. You say I wasn’t planning on sleeping with him. Even though you probably were, but your roommate is probably getting a little bit tired of your wallowing. He helps you up from the floor and you go to your room, trying not to step on any of the creaky floorboards, wondering if you said I love you because you meant to destroy things, or because you didn’t, and wondering which one’s worse.

The writing of this story was inspired by Junot Diaz’s short story, This is How You Lose Her (2012, Riverhead Books).
i am junk

joan mcnerney

dirty city dirty junk once i was useful
passed from 1 hand
to another dragged
thru his desire & hers pushed down

who threw me here putting a needle of lead in my brain?
lead completely then left thrown on this dump a piece of leaden junk how long will i lie here lie here

the heroin/e?
with heavy body
full round sobs
cold hideous
why can’t i cry out?

I.
He was arrested wearing contacts. At the end of the visiting room, I lean on the thin bar, slouch close to the circle of metal gauze punctuating the glass window. I can’t see him when I turn my head to listen, and when I face him, my tear ducts betray me, spreading liquid over lenses like ice slinking over a black pond. His eyes watering from the chemical burn from sleeping with his contacts in, he begs me to bring him his blue-rimmed glasses.

contacts

cheryl kutcher
II.
I lean over the counter, no glass barrier shielding me or the officer, who inspects the cleaning cloth, unfolds and refolds the fabric. I am glad I did not smooth the sappy love poem into the case lining, to be returned as an embarrassing, futile gesture, a denied hug. The humiliation of an officer handing me something I do not want. I read somewhere once that love can conquer most things but not the judicial system. Still, I thought someone would notice the love radiating from my being like solar flares, that gates would unlock because of the energies pulsating with enough power to disrupt technology. Now, solar flares are nothing before the law. These closed doors are sealed by reluctance, fear he will be punished on my behalf if I try to reach. I cannot grip a handle, swing a door inward, grant myself access: though he resides here, this place is not home. Opening these doors would be like pushing a palm through the building’s foundation.

The officer snaps the case closed, passes the eyewear into the white, empty hallway, where no one is wearing glasses.

III.
He stands there, against the white hallway wall, a thick glass door and dark, square room separating him from the officer, from me. The door is open, and I wave goodbye, finally able to see him without smudged glass between our fingertips, hear him without metal connecting our breath, our prayers, but he does not look at me, one hand wrapped around the small, unopened case.
still life with coyote

brian koester

Our train stopped
far from any town
so another could go.

It's more important to move freight than people. The other

train was long,
and while we waited
our engineers left

because they were scheduled to. We waited

while another crew was scrounged.
The train was shut down, and the sun baked

us like potatoes in foil.
We were warned not to go outside so we wouldn't be left behind.

There was no sound

of any machine.
Out the window
A coyote pup was on his back by the track as if the sun was so delicious he had to soak it up.

His coat matched the grain that was waving from the train to the whole horizon.

No blood anywhere.
He looked as wholesome

as any child's stuffed dog.
I couldn’t move far enough along

the train to get away from the smell.
Women fill shopping carts with stones.

A man stares at his empty hands; another kicks over a table and runs from his home; a child grasps for breath, pacing from window to window.

Birds are born without wings.

A school of fish are found rotting at the foot of a tree;

one war takes the shape of another; then another.